As yet Sagamore Hill has not repulsed all invaders.

To-morrow is "point-with-pride" and "view-with-alarm" day in Montpelier.

As a perpetual candidate, Bryan would look well on the Prohibition national ticket.

Of course it is certain that the submarines of the entente allies are observing the international laws when they approach German ships carrying freight.

Woodrow Wilson is not worrying about possible failure to get a renomination. There was nothing more sure in politics than his chances for being named by the Democrats.

The Vermont public service commission has accepted Brattleboro's new passenger station as satisfactory. As yet the commission has to put the seal of approval on the White River Junction passenger station.

The Appalachian club of Boston will find some invigorating ozone on top of Mount Mansfield when its members arrive there for their week-end and over-holiday stay. Besides, there will be some very interesting scenery.

With as many as 10,000 men killed to say nothing of other casualties—in a single night of the Verdun battle, it will not take long to exhaust the human resources of both the nations locked in deadly embrace at that point.

The people of the United States would perhaps welcome a change in the occupant of the German embassy in Washington. If Von Buelow is coming to take the place of Von Bernstorff there would not be any decided regrets among the people of the country to which he would be sent.

Hughes' plurality in the Oregon primary was more than twice as large as the vote cast for all persons in the Vermont primary. The women voted in Oregon, thus accounting in part for the great difference in the size of the vote in the two states. Undoubtedly, too, the woman vote helped to swell the Hughes triumph.

The eyes of the French army must be getting in some effective work to see that the Germans had withdrawn part of their forces from Fort Douaumont in order to concentrate on Dead Man's hill. The aeroplane is playing a very important work in reconnaissance, a work which formerly was done by cavalry detachments and not very effectually as compared with the vision from overhead.

PARTY POLITICS; NOT STATESMANSHIP.

It does not speak well for strict adherence to the merits of the case when the committee vote on the Brandeis confirmation followed strictly party lines, there being ten Democrats in favor of the appointment of the Boston man to the supreme court bench and eight Republicans who stood against the appointment. Surely there are merits in the case which have nothing to do with the question of politics, for some of them were brought out in the four months' discussion of the matter. However, when it came to a final showdown all other considerations apparently were dropped in favor of politics, politics, eternal politics. The ten Democrats arrayed themselves with a Democratic president in making a selection to the supreme court bench, and the eight Republicans lined up against the act of a man who was not a Republican. The appointment of a justice of the United States supreme court is a matter of such importance that it ought to be lifted above the smallness of party politics, but unfortunately it has to be dragged down to that level. If the Senate as a whole confirms the appointment of Brandeis it is probable that the act will be done by much the same party division.

THE PRESENT GERMAN VIEW-POINT.

The world is not permitted by the German censor to know the state of mind of the German people left at home—the women, the children, the aged and the incapacitated—concerning the continuation of the war; and the only hint one is able to get is now and then a dispatch allowed to slip through to a paper in some neutral country, said dispatch relating food riots and mob demands that the slaughter of brothers and fathers be made to cease, with an occasional statement like that of the appointment of a food dictator. The state of mind of the German people must have undergone a remarkable change since the first year of the war, if indeed the people were at all eager even then for the prosecution of the war. Their minds have been fed upon German victories so constantly that the repulses which the German armies have been receiving at Verdun during the past few weeks would come as a distinct shock were the full truth to be published in the German empire. Ever since the war started it has been one victory after another for Germany, according to the official Berlin statements, with only occasional reverses which the censor managed to minimize as much as possible; the enemy has been thrust back, repulsed, all but shattered at every turn, according to those same Berlin statements. The German left-at-home people had thus been so accustomed to news of victory and glorious conquest—and it must be admitted that Germany has accomplished much along that line—that real defeats now will be likely to inflame the people against German initiative in the war, a feeling that must develop in spite of the studied efforts of the German chancellor to impress upon the German people that the entente allies were responsible for the prolongation of the war. The public of Germany seems in a way to have a great awakening at the expense of the ruling house.
